A New Paradigm for Economic Development

David F. Shaffer and David J. Wright, March 2010

Universities and higher-education systems across the country are taking leading roles in their states' economic development efforts - and this Institute report says that trend seems likely to strengthen as the nation moves into the era of an "innovation economy." The study found that higher education's increasingly important role builds on, but goes well beyond, the research strengths of universities - incorporating efforts as wide-ranging as job training, business consulting, housing rehabilitation and even securing seed money for new businesses.
